TALK IN THE SENATE.

Two Amendments That May Cause It to Break Out Anew.

One of Them Deals with State Bank Tax Repeal.

That Subject Also to Come Up for a Hearing in the House.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26.—Among the possibilities of to-day's proceedings in the Senate is a vote on Mr. Peffer's pending amendment reviving the free coinage act of 1873.

If the motion should be made to-day to take a vote on that amendment some debate upon it will be inevitable. There is one other proposed amendment, the one repealing the prohibitory tax of 10 per cent. on State bank circulation, which may open up considerable discussion on a comparatively new branch of the subject.

Senators Butler of South Carolina, Morgan of Alabama, and other Southern advocates of the plan will desire to be heard in support of this amendment, and it is regarded as probable that Republican Senators will wish to put on record their views in opposition to the revival of what they term "wild-cat" currency.

These two amendments, the free coinage and the State bank circulation propositions, offer the largest possibilities for increased delay. Many of the twelve or fourteen other amendments of which notice has been given were apparently offered with no purpose of serious consideration.

The State bank question is also clamoring for a separate hearing in the House. The two important subjects under consideration by the House Committee on Banking and Currency are those intended to curtail national banks to secure and circulate bank notes to the full value of bonds deposited to secure their redemption and to secure the repeal of the 10 per cent. tax now imposed upon the circulation of banks other than national.

At the beginning of the present extraordinary session it was stated that the Committee would not favorably report a bill to repeal the State bank tax. Indeed, Chairman Springer was quoted as saying that such a bill should not be enacted.

Since then, however, it is believed by members of the Committee a change has come over some of those who at first opposed such a measure, and now they say the probabilities are that a majority of the Committee would vote to report the bill.

As to the National bank circulation, the understanding has all along been that a majority of the Committee was in favor of the proposition.

Chairman Springer is desirous of having the Committee arrange to hold sessions during the interim between the present session and the regular session (if any such interval should occur), so that it will be ready to report a bill upon one or the other of these matters shortly after the regular session commences in December.
